THE GIPSY'S FLOWERS. THE ORIGIN OF THE STORY OF BLUE-

BEARD. There was once a Spanish gentleman of high rank, who had led a very wild and dissolute life, but now desired to settle down on his estate and take to himself a wife who would preside over his household in a fitting fashion. Being rich and handsome, his wickedness went for naught, and soon he was betrothed to a lovely lady, whose family were pleased with the alliance and who brought him a fine for-

The wedding was celebrated with great comp, and when he brought his wife home to his palace the poor of the place, as usual, gathered about the door, and one, a withered old beggar woman, being loud in her praises of the lady's beauty, and begging to be permitted to present her with a bouquet of white wild flowers that she had gathered in the woods. "A poor offering, my lady," said the woman,
"but all the poor gipsy has to give."
The lady took the flowers with a smile, and dropped coin into the gipsy's hand. As she entered the door she bent her lovely head and inhaled the perfume of the flowers.

The servants remembered the action and her smile as she passed into her spartment leaning on her husband's arm, for it was the last they ever saw of her. An hour after she lay dead, and all the doctors in Madrid could not tell and all the doctors in Maind could not tell what killed her.

The young widower was very sad for a long time, but by and by he began to find life bright once more, and chose for himself a second wife. This lady was younger and lovelier than the first, though not so rich. Her predecessor's fate did not alarm her, for she was strong and full of health. Death seemed to be very far from so radiant a creature as she stood before the church alter and plighted her troth to the man with whom she hoped to pass her the man with whom she hoped to pass her life; but those who remembered the first wife's fate shuddered, as at the fall of evening she entered the gates of her husband's villa. The entered the gates of ner russams's vins. The same old gipsy who had greeted the former bride stood amid the crowd. "Heaven and the saints bless you, lady!" she cried. "I greeted her who came here be-fore and faded like a flower. May you live until your hair is as white as mine. Flowers are all I have to give. Will you honor me by taking them, lady?' The bride, as the other bride had done, accepted the offering, and repaid the gift with She held the blossoms loosely in her hand, and passed into the hall. A banquet was pre-pared and she partook of it. Wine was on the board; she tasted it. When the dance began none danced more gayly than the bride. It was a merry wedding; and when at last in the early hours of morning the music died away, the guests departed, and the lamps were ex-tinguished, the beautiful girl turned with smiles and blushes to seek her place of rest. As she crossed the threshold of the hall she stooped and picked something from the floor. "My poor gipsy's flowers," she said, "I will not reject the humble token of kindness;" and bending her face over them she passed out of entered the bridal room. All was still. The ismplight fell over the pillows, but no fair head rested upon them. He looked about him; in a far corner of the room lay what looked like a heap of rumpled satin, at first sight. He advanced toward it, and saw a hand that grasped convulsively a little bunch of white flowers, and, with a cry of horror, cast himself beside the body of his bride. She was dead; she bore no wound; no sign of in jury about her. Again the physicians could find no cause for the death, and people began to whisper tales of evil spirits who haunted this fatal bridal chamber, and did to death the fair beings who braved them by entering it cternal. He began in time to seek another bride, but in vain. No one would risk the fate of those other young and lovely women. No one would have this Bluebeard, the mystery of whose castle was so terrible, and for years the widower west a wooling without winning, until one morning, meeting the Donna Mora on her way to the church, her black eyes vailed beneath her black mantilla, he made a grand impression, and was per-mitted ere long to offer his hand and heart with true Spanish gallantry. Donna Mora, who was a widow, listened not ill-pleased. "I do not detest you, Senor," she said, "and I frankly tell you so; but you have had strange bridals herotofore. I do not feel tires of life, and desire to enjoy myself a little longer. Let me know why your first wives died. You must know."

"On my soul I do not," said the gentleme, then. I am ready to marry you, but be-fore I do I must be allowed to inspect your house from roof to cellar. You must waste it and give me the keys, and I must go there it and give me the keys, and I must go there alone with my sister. I will discover the myatery if there is one."
"Donna Mora," sald the gontleman, "do as you will. I vacate the dwelling at once. There are the keys. The long one of steet opens that fatal chamber, which I beg you not to enter—the bridal chamber of my dear brides. Adieu! Thanks for your promise, which I shall heater to claim when you ware.

which I shall hasten to claim when you sum-He kissed her hand and rode away. She at once made ready to seek the dwelling of which she had heard so much. The lumspect is.

"I begin to tremble," said Donna Anna.
"I have no fears," said Donna Mora.
Then she ordered the coachman to drive closer, descended and unlocked the gate with her own hands. All was still; only the echoes welcomed them.

Their feet awoke more upon the stairs; they nade Donna Anna nervous. Donna Mora was made Donna Anna nervous. Donna Mora was as brave as a man.

They inspected every room; they peeped into every closet, they opened the braiss chamber, and saw the dust that had gathered upon its ornaments, and from the neighbors they drew the whole story. All that was known. And for the first time Donna Mora hand of the old force and her flowers.

heard of the old gipsy and her flowers.

Then she waited, pacing the floors of the empty rooms, while Donna Anna watched from the window, and the brothers smoked cigarettes in the court-yard. What was she waiting for ! She told no one. "Sister, is any one coming! I thought I heard a step," said she.
"It is an old gipsy with some flowers," said

"It is an old gipsy with some nowers," same Donna Anna. And Donna Mora said: "Bid her come in." Then passing between the smoking brothers, Then passing between the smoating brothers, who scarcely looked up, and by the little dog, who growled, entered an old woman, shriveled and yellow, who courtesfed and said:
"May the good stars shine for the pretty senoritas and the brave senors. I have heard that the lady who is to be mistress here has come, and I am old and may not live to see her a bride, and would fain welcome her."
Then Dogga Mora angeween Then Donna Mora answered:
"I am the lady."
"Then may I offer a few wild flowers," said the gipsy, "and my good wishes! for the senior has been my benefactor. A poor gift, but do not scorn it." She held the flowers toward Donna Mcra, who took them and put them down upon the table. "Donna Anna," said she, "bring my dog here. Brothers, seize the gipsy."

In a moment more the struggling woman was held in a strong grasp, and Donna Mora, holding her dog in her lap, pressed the flowers to his nostrile.

"If he lives, free her; if he dies, have her arrested," she said, quietly.

Donna Anna hid her face. The brothers Dona Anna mi ner isce. The frothers sternly regarded first the woman, then the dog; the latter had begun to tremble. In a moment more he uttered a whine, long and terrible to listen to. Donna Mora dropped the flowers. The poor creature lay motion-less across her lap. He was dead.

"Have the woman arrested" said Donna Mora again. "It is she who has murdered these transfers.

these two poor women with her poisoned flowers, as she would have murdered me." But to the senor, when they met once more, the wild the "I know the ways of the gipsies and their art of poisoning flowers. I know also that an lajured gipsy girl is always avenged by her tribe. He who is false to one woman let no other woman trust. Adien." she said this:
